Abstract Landscapes: Exploring the Work of Robert Motherwell

Ages: 5+ (through adult)

Duration: Open-ended

Materials needed: Paper and paints, markers, or crayons.

Introduction: Robert Motherwell was a founding member of the Abstract Expressionist group, an American art movement that is characterized by spontaneity, improvisation, and a focus on the process, or action, of artistic creation. Based largely in New York, the Abstract Expressionists established the U.S. as a center of the art world following World War II. Artists working within this movement often created works of sweeping colors and shapes, using new, unorthodox methods and modes of artistic production, such as paint splatters, spills, and non-traditional materials.

Summertime in Italy (with Lines) was inspired by the artist’s summer stay in Alassio, Italy, in 1960. Influenced by the nature around him—the ochre hills, white sand beaches, and blue skies of the Italian landscape—Motherwell abstracted the landscape, reducing representative shapes, colors, and textures and omitting formal qualities to focus on the essential elements of the scene. Throughout his career, Motherwell would spend long hours observing nature, specifically the coastal areas of his birthplace in the Pacific Northwest, and then, later, in New England and the coasts of France and Italy. He would turn these hours of observation into various series of works.

Do
1. Motherwell would often become fixated on a certain landscape and make a series of abstract paintings inspired by it. Take some time to choose a location in nature to be the focus of your project.
2. Once you have chosen your location, spend a few moments observing the space. Think about the colors you see, the shape of the landscape, what is moving and what is unchanging.
3. Using markers, crayons, or paint, create an abstract version of your chosen landscape.
4. Continue to revisit and remake abstract representations of your location. Return to your location at different times of day, under different weather conditions, and, if you can, during different seasons. Notice how the colors, shapes, and basic elements of your landscape change. Note these changes or similarities in your series.
